The victims of the Texas Killing Fields were young, often poor, and many worked as prostitutes or drug addicts. They were often marginalized and vulnerable, and their deaths went unnoticed for years.

One of the most famous victims was Laura Miller, a 16-year-old runaway who was found dead in the Killing Fields in 1977. Miller's murder remained unsolved for decades, but in 2014, a DNA match led to the arrest of Clyde Hedrick, a former police officer.

Another victim was Donna Prudhomme, a 25-year-old mother of two who was found dead in the Killing Fields in 1991. Prudhomme's murder also went unsolved for years, but in 2019, a DNA match led to the arrest of William Reece, a serial killer who had already been convicted of murdering nine other women.

The Killers

The killers who preyed on the women of the Texas Killing Fields were a diverse group of men, ranging from serial killers to local predators. Some of the killers were motivated by sexual sadism, while others were simply looking for easy victims.

One of the most notorious killers was Robert Durst, a wealthy real estate heir who was convicted of murdering his friend Susan Berman in 2003. Durst is also suspected of murdering his first wife, Kathie McCormack, and a neighbor, Morris Black.

Another killer who operated in the Killing Fields was Wayne Henley, a teenage runaway who was convicted of murdering at least six young men in the 1970s. Henley lured his victims to his home with the promise of drugs or sex, then strangled them and dumped their bodies in the Killing Fields.

The Investigators

For years, the murders in the Texas Killing Fields went unsolved, and the case seemed destined to become another cold case. But in recent years, a team of dedicated investigators has cracked the case, bringing closure to the victims' families and justice to the killers.

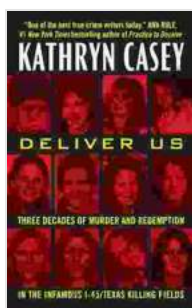

One of the key investigators was Cold Case Detective Tommy Montgomery. Montgomery spent years investigating the murders, and he was instrumental in linking them to a series of unsolved cases in other states.

Another key investigator was FBI profiler John Douglas. Douglas helped to create a psychological profile of the killer, and he provided valuable insights into the killer's motivations and behavior.
